According to the invention, clay raw material is divided into a coarse product fraction and a fine product fraction; the fine product fraction is preheated in a preheater, and the fine product fraction is then activated in a fluidized bed reactor and/or entrained bed reactor; the activated and heated fine product fraction is combined with the separated and cooled coarse product fraction, whereby the thermally activated clay fraction is quenched; and the combined clay fractions are discharged out of the reactor. The aforementioned method is advantageous in that the activated clay is not oxidized and therefore the clay is not colored reddish. Additionally, the preceding separation process saves a considerable amount of thermal energy, and the quenching process of the thermally activated clay stabilizes the total product against an undesired red coloring.

Traditional plastic seedling trays contribute significantly to pollution, while this method provides a sustainable alternative by utilizing coconut husks, an abundant and renewable resource. The process involves preparing coconut coir fibers, which are heated and compressed into molds at specific temperatures and pressures. This yields sturdy pots that nurture seedlings without restricting root growth, supporting healthy plant development. Key components include steel or aluminum molds with heating elements and temperature controls, a thin layer of biodegradable natural glue for binding, and a hydraulic press that applies pressure to shape the fibers. The resulting coir pots are durable for seedling growth, plantable directly into soil, and decompose over time, enriching the soil and promoting environmentally sustainable agricultural practices.
